"With Firm Reliance on Divine Providence"

The founding Fathers were keenly aware of God's providence and took care to see that the Declaration of Independence ended with this phrase: "And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the Protections of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes and our Sacred Honor."

During the Constitutional convention, not only did Benjamin Franklin appeal for daily prayers that they might be worthy of the support of divine Providence, but George Washington, too, interrupted arguments favoring half-way methods to patch up the poorly-working Confederation rather than to follow through with a real plan of union. He rose from his presidential chair to his full, imposing height and, his voice trembling with emotion, he declared: "If to please the people, we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we afterward defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and the honest can repair; the event is in the hand of God!"

His words were a bracing reminder of the need for high resolve if they were to be worthy of God's providential support. "From that moment," says historian John Fiske, "the mood in which they worked caught something from the glorious spirit of Washington."
